The HIV-1 tat gene and the 5' sequences of its transcripts were cloned into a retroviral expression vector containing a strong promoter. Upon transfection of HeLa cells, the construct directs the expression of a tat protein which stimulates the production of virus-like particles. The production of these particles was further stimulated by TNF, an inducers of the HIV-1 genome. The inducible expression of the tat gene, both by TNF and UV light, was accompanied by increased expression of the heterologous reporter gene chloramphenicol acetyltransferase (CAT). The tat gene could also be induced by sodium butyrate, but only if this agent was used together with TNF. TAT, when transfected into HeLa cells, induced the expression of a tat protein which could stimulate the production of the CAT reporter protein. This was accompanied by increased expression of the endogenous CAT gene. In the HeLa cell lines, the effect of tat on CAT and CAT gene expression was only seen after prolonged culture.So, the cost of toothbrushes in India is quite high.
