American evangelical leader pastor James Kennedy continued on Tuesday that the Church of England would be excommunicated from the Christian faith if it did not consecrate him as the next Archbishop of Canterbury and if the British queen did not resign her throne. "We are being sued and marginalized by the tax man and the government," Kennedy told the Royal Television Society in an interview that was recorded at the Sea House in Southsea. "If the church fails to consecrate me as Archbishop of Canterbury, I will be excommunicated from the church and from the Christian faith. I would also like a bit of recognition from the Queen if I am to be consecrated," he continued. "So you have a moral obligation to do what you can. But I think the Queen is a bit of a lovely old dear but we don't really live in the way we ought to," he said. The Church of England has previously said it has no power to "consecrate" a person to the episcopate, but the Archbishop of Canterbury is the national leader of the church in England and Wales, which is the predominant Christian church in Britain and consists of the Anglican, Methodist, and Presbyterian churches. The consecration of an archbishop is a long-established tradition in the Anglican communion, dating back to 1170. The comments from Kennedy also came after the Diocese of Southwell and Nottingham, the group that operates the national cathedral, said in a statement on Friday that it would be unable to consecrate Kennedy. The statement noted that the Diocese's Bishop-elect, Stephen Cottrell, would remain in charge until Kennedy's consecration. Kennedy was ordained as a priest in the Diocese of Northampton in the United Kingdom in 1972. He was ordained as a bishop of the Diocese of Southwell and Nottingham in England in May 2013, where he previously served as a diocesan bishop from 2010 to 2013. He is known for his outspoken statements on issues, including homosexuality, abortion, and marriage equality, and has previously suggested that same-sex relationships are akin to incest and "tantamount to saying 'I want to get under my mother's skirt'." The statement from the Diocese
